* Photoshop has two modes: the main window and the image workspace. The main window gives you an overview of all options and features, and you can click on the tabs along the top to switch between features. The image workspace is the area within Photoshop that actually edits the image itself. Figure 16-1 shows a typical image opened in Photoshop. You can work in full-screen mode by pressing F11 or choosing View >

Full Screen to work at full magnification. FIGURE 16-1: You can use Photoshop as a compositor or retoucher for businesses or individuals. ## Compositing Photoshop's `_compositing_` mode enables you to use layers, masks, and blend modes to combine multiple images together. The process of compositing is a bit like using a framemaker (or `_assemblage_`, as it's called in French) to build a picture — although a framemaker gets to work directly with the elements that make up the picture, rather than into a blank canvas. You can use compositing in one of three ways: Merging:* You use this technique when you want to stitch two or more images together into a single, larger composite. Photoshop gives you the ability to choose a background image and place it at the bottom of the layers stack, which lets you work with all your images on one visible page. Effects:* You use this technique to add effects to an image, such as a drop shadow or transparency. It's not uncommon to use this technique to create a `_watermark_` (a transparent image that appears at the bottom or side of the picture) on an image. Effects:* This technique is the same as the previous one, except that you apply effects to more than one image. ## Saving and Exporting When you're done editing images, you need to save them. Most professionals save images to separate files with a `.psd` (Photoshop document) name, but you also can make a `multi-image.psd` file. Saving individual images:* When you close a session in Photoshop, it automatically saves the image that you're working on. If you're working on several images, you can always choose `File⇒Save` to save a new image. If you save an image from the screen, it becomes part of the current document, so keep that in mind. Creating

This site is a wiki for anyone who uses Photoshop and needs to know how to work with Photoshop Elements.

My aim is to make this wiki the definitive Photoshop Elements resource. I write articles about using Photoshop Elements. This is the main article. Feel free to edit this page or to create a new page. I can't stop you but I would be interested to know which page is most popular or if you have any alternative suggestions. If you would like to add a tutorial, please use the Discussion page. The Photoshop Teacups Forum also has a lot of Photoshop Elements tutorials, please search for Photoshop Elements teacups. You can visit the wiki in three different ways. To use the computer-generated navigation, click on the images at the top of each page.

To use the hand-coded navigation, click on the links below each row of articles. To navigate without the hyperlinks, click on the navigation panels. You can filter the results by category. Category articles are the articles in the Classifieds section. To see an article's category at the top of a page, use a category filter. Type a category name in the search box. You can use these links to go directly to the most popular pages. To search for a specific article, type in a keyword or phrase in the search box below the list of articles. You can search for terms in the text or by using advanced search. To refine your search, use the Advanced Search page. If you are looking for a tutorial that you can follow, you will need to be aware that the blue tutorial arrows at the top of each page do not link to tutorials. Each article in this site is tagged with a number. Use the table of contents to the left to navigate. Use the search to find an article or tutorial. It is also possible to browse the table of contents, search for articles on a specific topic, or try the Advanced Search page. To add an article to the table of contents, click on the link to the left of the article. To add a tutorial to the table of contents, click on the link to the left of the tutorial. To add a classified advertisement to the table of contents, type in a keyword in the search box below the list of articles. You can use the embedded flash gallery to browse photos. What's New in the Adobe Photoshop 2021 (version 22)?

Advocate for the right of nurses to refuse certain care: 'You'd be surprised how many nurses don't want to do that'. Nurses' right to refuse a procedure or treatment that is against their conscience was initially enacted to protect against the eugenics movement of the 1800s. This right is well established in law in most countries. Despite this, many in the nursing profession feel that they have been banned from refusing care to their patients because of the perceived implications of this act. The purpose of this study was to establish the existence of a right to refuse treatment (RFRT) among nurses in Australia, and to identify the factors that may influence such a decision to refuse care. Using a convenience sample, nurse-run support groups at four tertiary education institutions across Australia were contacted and asked to distribute an electronic survey to members who were interested in participating in the study. The survey gathered information regarding nurse demographics, their length of career and experience as a nurse, the specifics of their work, and their experiences of being able to refuse care. Data were analysed using descriptive statistics and logistic regression to test for associations between variables and the question of whether a nurse would refuse to give a patient care. Of all respondents, 78% agreed that nurses are obligated to provide care as outlined in Australian law and agreed that they would refuse care. The reasons given for not doing so included ethical and religious beliefs, concern about skills and capacity of nurses and fear of malpractice action. The factors that may influence the decision to refuse care included the severity of the condition of the patient, the accessibility and cost of the procedure, level of training of the nurse and fear of malpractice action. Within the sample, nurses had a strong belief that they could refuse care, with 89% agreeing that they would refuse to give a patient care if they did not believe that it was appropriate. However, they were very reluctant to speak up and asked others to take responsibility for caring for their patients. This study highlights the discrepancies that exist between nurses' beliefs about their right to refuse treatment and their actual practice. These findings highlight the importance of being explicit in the language used when enacting the RFRT to ensure nurses are not misinformed.
