Pixie is a unique synthesizer application that provides an innovative experience for the creation and manipulation of musical sound. It uses OSC as a message transport, a very powerful message based protocol to send messages from user to user. On the other hand, Pixie runs on the PC's own oscillators (a CPU and a GPU). There are no external plugins needed to get started. Pixie is optimized for speed and CPU power and it is not designed for super-sampling (sample rate up to 10.000Hz). "Pixie" is a more challenging application than the regular "oscillator-players" and the result of your work is sent to OSC using messages. The program is a color picker. It is a very handy tool if you often have to select a color or choose one from an existing group. You can load and save its settings from a file. The first thing you need to do is click on the tool icon to start the program. Next you need to pick the location where you want to drop the program executable file. The executable file is not too large. After clicking the tool icon the program will be displayed in the system tray area. It has a very simple interface with a tiny frame in which the current position (in pixels), hexadecimal value, and HTML code of the color that you are hovering over is displayed. You can also use this tool to copy the current color's HTML code. The color can be brought up with a click of the mouse, as well as its HSV and RGB values. In the same menu there is also an option to bring up a magnifying window with a large interface, where the actual color is not displayed. Finally, there are also hotkeys, which enable you to copy the current color's HTML code, bring up a color mixer window with the current color, and take a picture with it.
