Why are they given different names in this case? Are they two different tags? A: Without autoproperty attribute (or with it's value of false) the browser sends the following header on the request: X-Requested-With: XMLHttpRequest This header is crucial to make sure that only the page itself sends the request to the server. For example, I made a form with autoproperty set to true and it works fine. But with novalidate set to true it sends the following header, which makes the browser think that the page itself requested this form. X-Requested-With: XMLHttpRequest And as a consequence the browser asks the server to validate the request. Which causes an exception in the server since it does not expect this request. This is what I mean: UPDATE: This page contains the list of required http-headers for forms in combination with the corresponding validation. A: If autoproperty="true" is used in ASP.NET page, the ASP.NET engine does not set the request entity to the X-Http-Method-Override header that causes browsers to make the HTTP OPTIONS request instead of the GET request when a form is submitted. This is the default setting and it's the only setting in which the autoproperty attribute is recognized. It's the only attribute that is useful. The rest are ignored. If novalidate="true" is set in the form, the browser does not post the form data to the server, causing a HTTP exception because the request data does not match the method. This is the default setting and it's the only setting in which the novalidate attribute is recognized. Q: Multiple input types to the same table I am trying to create a table that accepts input from different sources (e.g. wikidata, a form on the site and through an API). I want to have a column for each of these sources and have the first entry from the first input, the second entry from the second input
