Typical, what a surprise. Via the most conventional and mainstream outlet of the mainstream, those wheels that should be fired in the bloody circular labyrinth of the offseason, we have another case of a good defensive coordinator falling a team after a winning season. Sadly, it's not the defensive coordinator. New England's New England, specifically Sean McVay, is now 1-1 in his job. "You hope when you start," McVay said on Tuesday, "that you get that right first game. I certainly did." His first game — in other words, the one that McVay actually designed — was against the Redskins, who he had never faced until now. McVay's team had already built an 11-point lead before Washington's Travis Kelce scored the biggest touchdown of the year on a 73-yard catch-and-run, turning into the Eagles' second and final touchdown of the second half. McVay indicated afterward he had seen this coming, saying "it's just Washington." But he felt pretty confident at the end of the game that the damage had been done. I am wondering how I should deal with conflicts of different parameters (like functions, constructor, etc) which do the same thing, but have different parameter types, when using an interface. In the below example, i have two functions that have two conflicting types for a common functionality. In principle, I would think that for this kind of conflict, I would have to use multiple inheritance (or using interfaces and containment). So is there a better way? namespace Example { interface IType { } struct Type1 : IType { } struct Type2 : IType { double DoSomething(double x); } } template struct DoSomething { void Do(T x) { // do something } } void DoSomething(Type1 x) { DoSomething d; x.DoSomething(5.0); } void DoSomething(Type2 x) { DoSomething d; d.Do(2.0); } A: There is no "better" way; it depends entirely on the situation. In the example, you may decide to use overloading, rather than inheritance, because you're using a templated function. template

INTRODUCTION {#sec1-1} ===== Authors are commonly requested to submit the names of all individuals and institutions where they have published their work. Both the publishers and funding agencies insist on this practice to ensure the credit and credibility of the publications. Usually authors do not consider furnishing the names of their colleagues as a breach of professional ethics. In reality the list often contains names of people of various fields and diverse academic backgrounds. Laulani et al.[[ref1]] and Hsueh et al.[[ref2]] have discussed the pros and cons of presenting the names of collaborators and faculty members for publication in different contexts. There are several other articles which examine this subject in greater depth.[[ref3]][ref4][ref5][ref6]] Authors are sometimes obliged to list all names due to regulations imposed by the ethics committees or due to the nature of the topic
