Q: Same-origin XSS on PasteNova.com? What, if any, is the likelihood of having a XSS vulnerability on PasteNova.com from a JavaScript injection point of view? If I were to insert a code block in the HTML document and say `eval(document.location);` Does that make me likely to have the same-origin policy issue? If the answer is yes, then how can they compromise the site if they're not serving the file locally? A: The same-origin policy is not a javascript quirk. If you enter the following into a javascript window: `Then the javascript will create a document, and try and inject another document into the current document.` If the origin of this document is the same as the document you're in, or the same domain, then the script has full access to the current document. So, if you're in a javascript window: You will have the same origin policy. Note that you will not have the same origin policy if you have a window with no tag. `alert("foo")` There's no origin-bounding from there. Recently, there have been increasingly strong demands for light-weight automobiles. In view of this, high-strength cold rolled steel sheets for automobiles in particular are required to improve the strength and reduce the thickness of the product to be used, thereby to meet this demand for weight reduction. However, such a high-strength cold rolled steel sheet is extremely susceptible to the development of cracks during subsequent cold rolling. When a high-strength cold rolled steel sheet is processed by a reduction rolling apparatus or the like for continuously producing automobile steel products, various problems may occur, such as the occurrence of micro-cracks.
