What is EA SPORTS FIFA? What Is This Game All About? Why FIFA in particular? FIFA Ultimate Team One of the key features of FIFA Ultimate Team is the ability to customise the look of your squad by creating your own player. This is a great feature, but it's a shame that the customising options for your players are so limited. For example, your entire squad could look unique, yet you'll have no control over how the team plays. In this review I want to compare how this customisation system functions in FIFA Ultimate Team (FUT) for Nintendo Switch with how the system works in FIFA 20 for PlayStation 4. FIFA Ultimate Team for PlayStation 4 lets you create a custom squad and customise how they play, however these customisations are based on the real world statistics for some players, such as their height, weight, and full name. It's a weird system that doesn't work very well, and in my opinion is far more developed in the Switch version, especially considering this feature is supposed to be one of the more popular features of the title. In fact, FIFA 19 allowed you to create a custom squad in the menus before you even got to the multiplayer portion of the game, and once you were playing that allowed you to customise your player's appearance, thus creating your custom squad as you played. In FIFA Ultimate Team, you have to have a custom squad saved before you can play in multiplayer, so it's got to be saved before you can access the menus, but once you reach that menu you can customise your squad by choosing a name, an appearance, and some other very basic options. Players The appearance of your players in Ultimate Team is the weakest part of the game, and is one of the very few things that this game didn't come with that is "featured" in the menus as it was in FIFA 19. In FIFA 19 there was a setting for your player's hair colour, skin tone, face shape, ear lobes, name tag, number, unique facial markings, individual clothing, and fitted clothing. None of the clothing looks good and only the facial markings and a few of the hair styles look very unique, but if you want your team to have a custom squad you can create, then FIFA 19 is the only option in a generation.
