Also, in Windows 7 (and many other Windows versions) start>run command>ipconfig /all show that the TCP/IPv4 protocol default gateway is "10.10.1.1" and I have an IP address "10.10.9.1" available. I can ping "10.10.1.1" from the command line, but I can't ping "10.10.9.1" from my other networked computers. It looks like most routing information is on "10.10.1.1" and all the traffic destined for "10.10.9.1" is being routed there. How can I disable this behavior? A: I finally figured it out. The problem was that on the computer which did not connect to the wireless router, I had Windows

Firewall enabled (though in Windows Defender Firewall settings, I had Windows firewall enabled too)

Windows Defender Windows Firewall (there were some other rules like my antivirus software) I disabled all of those and it worked! From this other answer on this site, it seems like router settings were the problem. It may have been that in Windows Firewall settings, the UDP and TCP ports for Router and DNS Server were both checked. On my other system, the UDP and TCP ports were not. A: Note: This is not the issue. I am answering because many people are spending their time looking for this. Just type this ipconfig /all in my command line and check what is your gateway on this system.

Note: in your computer, the gateway of TCP/IP will be at tcp/ip properties of your network adapter card. Then manually set that same gateway on your computer. A: On Windows 10 the solution was quite simple... On the Server Object, turn off TCP/IP On the Client Object, turn on TCP/IP The latest episode of the world's most popular car podcast is here!
