Automation increasingly moves into more high-tech production lines Read More > That's a potential change that could significantly reshape the US manufacturing sector over the next two decades. A substantial portion of manufacturing jobs in the United States now involve relatively high-tech production lines, such as vehicles built by auto manufacturers, machinery used in the electronics industry or heavy-duty trucks built by manufacturers of commercial vehicles. According to a new working paper from the Russell Sage Foundation, co-authored by the University of Wisconsin-Madison's Christian Dustmann and Massachusetts Institute of Technology professor Alexander Lucangelo, the high-tech manufacturing base of the United States is a potential Achilles' heel of American manufacturing that could substantially shrink over the next 20 years. "Our research finds that manufacturing employment in the US would likely shrink by at least 14 percent in 20 years if these manufacturing production tasks become automated," the authors wrote. With this high-tech manufacturing base, the United States would lose 9.5 million manufacturing jobs to automation over the next 20 years, the paper found. The paper's authors concluded that the changes in American manufacturing would likely be most acute in the transportation and heavy equipment sectors.3×3 Analysis This is a self exam 3×3 analysis that has been a big
