What Is a Raster Image? A raster image is one whose picture elements are dots, not lines or shapes. With a raster image, a picture is printed or displayed on your computer screen, TV, or monitor. Figure 9-4 offers a simple example of a raster image. The image on the left uses 300 by 200 pixels. The image on the right is 300 pixels wide, using a resolution of 600 dots per inch (dpi). Figure 9-4: A raster image is made up of dots, not lines. In the dark-on-light example in Figure 9-4, the dots are black. The dots in the image on the right are more detailed, used to convey the idea that the image on the left is merely an outline of the target. Raster images are more commonly created with high-resolution files (300 ppi or more) and images with reduced color quality. For example, the RGB-24 image format has a resolution of 24 bits per pixel, or 1,536 levels of color, but does so at very small dots per inch (dpi). A TIFF (Tagged Image File Format) file allows you to store images in a high-resolution format with a file size small enough to store on a memory card for a digital camera or on a CD for a computer. In these formats, a TIFF file can store a resolution of 300 ppi or more. RGB-24 files cannot store alpha-channel transparency, so if you want to manipulate your images with this feature, you must use a TIFF file. I have a bad habit of doing too much within Photoshop at once and forgetting to save the image. If you modify the colors in a picture, saving the modified image can be tricky. I usually format my hard drive to save JPEG or TIFF files instead of RGB. If you save your RGB files in a folder other than the main Photoshop folder, you can rename the file extension to avoid naming conflicts. This helps ensure that the picture is still saved when you save the file. When saving the image in Photoshop, the picture is not altered, only saved. If you choose to save a Photoshop image in the new format, it's saved in the default format of your computer. Photoshop uses one of several color formats for its images. Choose either sRGB or Adobe RGB color spaces, or fall back to the monitor's native color
