Multiplayer WARMACHINE Online Multiplayer WARMACHINE game: So a new frost diorama from my home video game collection. Isometric view, 1-48, easy to see all the miniatures in a little scene. Enjoy!About this diorama: This is a collection of some of the miniatures I designed for my wargame project, MIGHT OF MONSTERS. They are warriors from the Sybarite Empire, a land that used to have a union with the Elden Imperial League. This miniature is a valiant warrior from the Sybarite Imperial Army, for hire in the civil wars. (When you see the bust of the Sybarite Emperor on his armored warhorse, that's because that's my player's character: Kurzus.) The Sybarites were a warmongering empire that dominated the Lands Between for centuries. (The Elder Elden were the original inhabitants of the lands; they were pushed out from their homelands by the rise of the war-oriented Sybarites.) They were covered in their most powerful warriors and goon squads and were the most feared foes in the Lands Between. This mini was featured in the "Soul of the Steel Gods" insert booklet, playing a pivotal role in the graphic novel. He is armed with the "Silencer" Stormbone sword, an armored version of the normal Stormbone that was used with great effect on the battlefield. It was made by the Meeladans, one of the two faction of the Sybarites, and can also be found on the Sybarite Magus and Magus Stormplate. This piece was made in 2007, and the original idea was to use it for a quarter of the Dark Ages in the MIGHT OF MONSTERS game.The London Olympic organizers no longer intend to build a facility for art competitions at the Olympic Park, the Evening Standard reports. The contestants, however, will keep the Olympic logo or other marks on their work to show they competed at the games. Only one of the competition venues will be decorated inside, with murals and banners from the Olympics theme. The Organizing Committee said the work will be done ahead of the 2012 Olympics in London, in order to show athletes and spectators from around the world a unique London experience. Below are photos of some of the Olympic competition venues at Olympic Park, from the London Games website:1066

The company was asked to comment by a user of SlashGear's Chinese tech site about an article that reported that the company was seeking to modify an optical mouse with the ability to emulate the pointing device of a Windows tablet. In a statement to The Reg, a Microsoft representative confirmed that the company was working on a "touch keyboard" for Windows 8 touch devices, but that the system was not yet in final testing and might not make it to the public. "We'll let you know as soon as we have something to announce," the Microsoft rep told us. "We're not going to comment on our R&D [research and development] activities, but we will tell you when we have something to announce." Earlier this week, when I posed the question to SlashGear's president, I got the response from Microsoft that I now know was a reference to this story. At the time SlashGear was just beginning its Sneezy research and development story and I knew that the site's reporters were having a lot of fun with the tech press. So when they told me
