Q: Difference between a reference and a pointer, and how to make it crash.

void funct1(int *p) { int x = 5; *p = 10; // reference printf("%d ", x); // reference printf("%d ", *p); // reference printf("%d ", x); // reference printf("%d ", *p); // reference printf("%d ", &x); // reference printf("%d ", &p); // reference printf("%d ", &x); // pointer, no reference printf("%d ", &p); // reference printf("%d ", &x); // pointer, no reference } void funct2(int *p) { int x = 5; p = 10; // pointer printf("%d ", x); // reference, p is now 10 printf("%d ", *p); // reference, p is now 10 printf("%d ", x); // reference, p is now 10 printf("%d ", *p); // reference, p is now 10 } int main() { int x = 10; int *p = &x; funct1(p); funct2(p); getchar(); }

So my question is why do these programs output the same thing, so I ran them with valgrind, and it said they're the same, but it shouldn't right? Because in funct1 I've assigned the reference to p to point to the same address as x, but in funct2 I've set the pointer to p to point to the same address as x (which should be 10). So the output is still the same as if I do funct1 before funct2, and it should not be the same because I've set the pointer to 10 and the reference to 5, not 5. So how can
