Previous research regarding antenatal stressors and fetal symptoms in extremely low birthweight (ELBW) infants suggests that the presence of stressors during pregnancy may be associated with adverse fetal outcomes. However, this relationship remains uncertain. A secondary aim of this study was to examine the relationship between antenatal stressors and fetal symptoms. A review of all mothers admitted to a level 3 neonatal intensive care unit and their babies between 1999 and 2007, with birthweights of less than 1000 g, was conducted. Antenatal stressors and fetal symptoms were retrospectively extracted from the medical records. Logistic regression was used to examine relationships with birthweight or =3, and severe retinopathy of prematurity. Of the 100 ELBW infants, 29% had at least one antenatal stressor, with an individual stressor being present in 55% of cases. Of 69% of the infants with at least one antenatal stressor, 55% also had at least one fetal symptom. In a multivariate analysis, antenatal stressors were found to be associated with a greater risk of birthweight Modern JS - zanindeni ===== cbsmith If you want to c6a93da74d
