we compared the groups that actually received the treatment (intervention group) to a group of participants with a similar degree of deprivation and did not get the treatment (control group). we did this because we wanted to see whether the effects of the intervention were larger in areas where people were exposed to the intervention activities less. however, because we also tested the people who were not exposed to the intervention, it is possible that people from the treatment group were more motivated than people in the control group to comply with the instructions of a doctor and to be careful about handwashing. we took some personal details from each of the participants and gave out a book and a pen for each member of the family. this is because we wanted to show that the message on the advertisement was affecting their behaviour. all participants received five separate pieces of social marketing promotion material to increase handwashing practice. these included flipcharts (diagrams), flipcharts (enlarged from the original flipcharts), carrying post cards, messages attached to the walls with tape, and stickers. we used a specific questionnaire to assess the exact reason for not adopting social marketing as well as the subjective importance of handwashing. for example, the question: “how critical do you think it is to wash your hands after visiting the toilets?”. this allowed us to quantify the importance of handwashing in everyday life in the target group. when people arrived at the clinic, their identity cards were taken. they were then asked to put on a name tag and an elastic waistband with the assigned number (a random 10-digit number). participants were then invited to take a seat and meet the study team for a short consultation. participants completed a survey on their demographic, socioeconomic, and handwashing-related information.

the participants were all family members of a child with a previous positive case of seasonal influenza. the authors give no definition of a positive test result, the definition of the time period for the influenza-like illness (ili) or the positive case of influenza, only that they have been diagnosed with influenza by a physician, and that they have been admitted to the hospital this is clearly not a primary prevention study. the outcome is a new episode of ili (seasonal or pandemic). it is unclear when the case definition and study period for ili (seasonal or pandemic) should be set, or how many days should be used for analysis. also, it is not clear why the authors report absenteeism for only 96 infants. the authors do not report a period prevalence for ili in the intervention and control groups. the authors report data for total number of episodes of ili. the difference between number of ili episodes, the number of tests, and the number of cases is not clear. symptoms were not assessed according to a prespecified protocol. also, within each group the analyses are conducted using a repeated measures analysis, which does not allow to assess the difference between the groups. this is a very complex study. the study involves more than one medication, a nutritional supplement, an oral hygiene device, a chewing-gum product, or a probiotic product. the participants may all have used several of these products at the same time, and there is no control over this. the pre-post design of the study does not allow a correct assessment of effects of the added products
