Various metal oxide semiconductor field effect transistor (MOSFET) configurations are well known in the art. A typical configuration is that of a P-channel MOSFET where the substrate serves as a drain. A common technique for N-channel MOSFET manufacturing, referred to as a P-well, uses a similarly configured structure of a P-channel MOSFET where the substrate is used as a drain and the n-type impurities in the P-well serve as the channel material. A variation of the P-well process is the so-called "pocket" P-well process in which there is a P-well with a high n-dopant concentration that serves as the drain. A typical pocket P-well process is illustrated in FIGS. 1-3. Referring to FIG. 1, on a substrate 10 of n-type material is grown a P-well 11. A buffer layer 12 of undoped silicon is then grown on the P-well. An insulating layer 13 is then deposited on the buffer layer 12. The insulating layer 13 is then etched to form a trench 14. This is illustrated in FIG. 1 as a dashed line. A sidewall oxide 15 is then grown on the sides of the trench 14. As shown in FIG. 2, a source 16 and a drain region 17 are then formed in the P-well 11 to complete the process. This process leads to some problems. One problem is that the source and drain regions at the edges of the P-well are typically substantially doped. Furthermore, the source and drain regions near the trench 14 may experience a long channel effect. A second problem is that the high n-dopant concentration in the P-well during the pocket P-well process leads to a high n-dopant concentration near the trench. As shown in FIG. 3, the high n-dopant concentration near the trench region is problematic. This leads to a short channel effect. It would be desirable to overcome the short channel effect and the long channel effect problems.
