OpenCV uses built-in libraries of software for color space, blob detection, Haar Cascade, and much more. It's also based on open-source tools that have no licensing problems. The application also can use a variety of open-source tools for source enhancement like OpenEXR, PTGui and OpenJPEG. Sartorial is the new Personalization tab that lets you see the library, view and edit thumbnails, and edit your style. The Classic part of the ribbon is also organized with standard icons for your editing and management. It also uses the Elements relationship feature to make existing artwork like transitions or shape layers more powerful. The one thing many photographers share is that they're often frustrated by the limitations of their DSLRs, and the camera-like capabilities of apps like the newest iPhone or the latest flagship camera on the market today. Owning a professional-grade camera is a fairly tight budget. I don't claim to have a perfect solution that I could take to a friend and say "you'd be amazed at what this app can do." The building's architects, Zachary Breisacher (Z-B) and Thomas Breisacher (T-B), feature flying automated building panels for the facade, which were fabricated via 3D printing. The panels can be arranged in 37 unique configurations to blend together seamlessly and form the building's illusions. The 3D-printed facade was inspired by the graphic of the flying squid, or Arbicauda, and constructed with concrete that could be stained using the porous material—essentially creating a concrete facade that can be made to change color on a daily basis. The panels can be lit from within and take on different colors throughout the day and night. "From the time we started conceptualizing the site drawings, we knew the way this facade would eventually be installed was going to be new and different," says T-B. "We were excited about being a part of a new process. Our goal was the construction process. When we first began to work with the structural engineer, we were able to understand what [the crane] was going to do." The panels were fabricated by Composite 3D. The building's structural engineer used a 3D laser scanner and measured the panels to ensure they fit together correctly before installation. Once the panels were completed, they were laser-etched with graphics, and then 3D-printed using the concrete material. A 3D-printed guide was used to help install the panels at the panel's shop to ensure they fit together correctly.
