Previously, when you wanted to remove an unwanted object from the image, you had to select it and fill it in with a new color. Adobe has developed something more complicated that is called "Spot Removal." This is a new symbol that looks like a colored eye in a box/circle. The symbol will appear on whatever background is underneath it. Using a brush like tool, you can paint out the object that you want to remove and also, by using an eraser, get rid of the unwanted feature, like a light spot in a picture. It helps you more easily remove unwanted elements, like a wall that is in the background of an image. It also helps you easily remove elements that you find distracting, like airport signs and equipment, obvious objects, or "loupe" objects. Speaking of layers, I'm big fan of layers, but I'm not sure if it's still possible to dive into each of them with Photoshop CS6. You can't just click the little box in the corner of the layer palette. There are also no handy keyboard shortcuts for opening/closing layers. Overall, I've found that this method is unreliable at best. It's better to hide/unhide layers and adjust layer masks. Another feature I'd love is the new Fireworks-like tool in the Control panel. It's called Mask. When working with layers, you can temporarily turn off a layer by simply clicking on Mask. With this feature, you have the same masking controls as you have in Fireworks. I've actually been using it occasionally to mask photos, but I've written it off because I need more control in Photoshop.
