Photoshop has had much, much more noticeable speed improvements. The time between clicks for me has been cut from 3 seconds to 1 now. It is still not perfect, but it is getting better. I am now just be launching to a stable image, I never drag my file to the desktop before opening the file. Before this update, I would launch to a stable file, then drag my file to my desktop after launching, and then open the file. I don't mind having to wait 2-3 seconds between clicks. But my reaction time to the new interface is different. I'm used to thinking of the desktop as an interface to make adjustments to the content of the image. It is the same for entering comments. Now I get to my images in the mobile app immediately, and have to wait 3 seconds to do anything. For me it is slow, and I would like to have the option to add comments, and mark images as favorites right away. I use Photoshop for both editing and organizing my work. It is my tool of choice for mixing and matching images – so the ergonomics are very important. Subtle changes in the way I work are a necessity. I need to quickly view my images – some are displayed as thumbnails and some not. I need to easily change the size of one image and the canvas size for the other images. I need to have my canvas sized for the size of the images. I like to resize images in "square" when I create an HDR image. The folks at Corel have created a new class of software: Pixelmator. It is a true "photoshop for the iPad." It has many of the same tools that Photoshop has – like the eraser tool (even though it isn't as extensive – as it has to be done on a tablet). It also has some features that Photoshop does not have, like the ability to scan images.

A layer is a container for a single content. It's used to group different content — photos, text, graphics, and videos — and allows them to be edited individually. As a group of content, layers make it easy to edit content and the order of layers helps you move items around, change the order of layers in the document, and work with them more efficiently. There are three types of layers: Stacking layers create individual layers that stack on top of each other, Grouped layers show the layers in a group and are stacked together, and Layer styles add basic formatting to layers. A document is the specific form of media that you upload to the computer. Complete documents are designed to be edited and modified, while a folder is a package that holds multiple documents. What this means is that documents can be edited until the very end, dragging and dropping images, text, and other visual elements into a growing document.
