Last month, the privately held VC-funded startup won the...(CNN) The wife of a North Carolina state trooper is suing the school district where her daughter attends, claiming the school's dress code is an example of institutional bias against girls who wish to wear pants to class. The suit also challenges the reality of school dress codes -- it notes that female students are not required to wear school uniforms. A student at Spring Hope High School in Fayetteville, North Carolina, told a district official last year that she wanted to wear pants to school in the fall, but her mother told her to cover up, her attorney told The Fayetteville Observer The student then sought guidance from the principal, who told her the school had a uniform policy in place. The plaintiff in the suit, Mariah Balmer, contends the uniform policy makes students feel singled out or inferior to other students, and that it impacts students of all races.
