Whether I'm working on a traditional desktop, a tablet, or an iPad, I'm constantly carrying one or more of my Microsoft Surface Pro 3, Apple MacBook Pro, or iPhone. With Photoshop on the iPad Pro, I can now shoot photographs, take notes, and edit them in zero time, with none of that typing. When you launch Photoshop Sketch on a new document, you're confronted with a rather bare-bones interface. The app looks like duplicates the WYSIWYG interface of a web-based editor like Photoshop, and for the most part, it is. Even so, it's pretty stunning. You can't pick up just any file and expect to edit it. Personas (on both professional and free plans, depending on your account tier) are described on their own page on the Adobe website. But, if you want to just learn about the service, you'll find that on the Adobe site, as well. Those with an Academic account and the up-to-date CC subscription can take advantage of the freebie and a 30-day free trial. This is the best way to see how the program works and determine if you want to try the full version. Ultimately, for Adobe's design work, the iPad Pro is a joy to use. And that means you should seriously consider the iPad Pro (and the iPad) for your design work, and not just the Mac. However, iDevice enthusiasts need to at least consider using macOS on their devices. In some design workflows, the iPad Pro is not a joy to use, because it doesn't feel like a real Macbook Pro. macOS has changed the mobility of a touch device like a Macbook Pro, and iPhone users need to get used to this.

Adobe announced a few builds at its annual MAX conference in May. The most significant of these was Photomerge CSR Mode, which allows images with matched and unmatched exposures to be merged into a single continuous-tone image. Corel had a similar version in Rhapsody. The tool is limited to merging images in the CSR mode. Corel also announced a new version of ALL RAW, which also allows users to merge images in the CSR mode. Batch Conversion and Edit Images in Memory options are not available for images that are collected in CSR. A feature called "Exposure Aware Fill" analyzes the images you are editing and creates a mask from the picture's current exposure. Using the spatial information in the mask, the regions exposed to light becomes pure gray and the non-exposed parts be transparent. The masked pixels are replaced with a neutral gray without a noticeable drop in detail. Motion tools will also be making their way to you. There will be a new motion editor with a more intuitive UI, plus the ability to work with a host of new motion camera types. Overall, the new feature will allow users to create a variety of video effects without having to consider any coding. As mentioned before, AI technology will also be powering many of the new tool options. In Photoshop, this means tools that can assist users with applying transformations, creating text effects, adding textures, harmonious designs, or much more. It also means technology that can automatically adjust the key of a song – something which many people have been trying to figure out.
