The new tools make sense because we're exploring new ways to engage our existing customers and inspire new ones. The full set of places within Lightroom where you can make comments and send feedback is the same as in Photoshop, with this new tool. The tools are inherently linked, meaning that the comments that you make to a particular image using Lightroom's tools also update the RAW file or DNG file that accompanies that photo. Some might say it was for this reason that Photoshop had to be paid for, as this is a more complete solution than what many photogs had prior to CS6. In fact for better or worse, several people have referred to Lightroom as a "Photoshop killer" or a "Photoshop [Future Version?]" I'm sure there's more but you get the point. Before I get into this review, I just have to say that I love Lightroom and the fact that Adobe decided to double the price for this upgrade shows that even though the company has some serious money and a lot of resources, they're still a startup and it's not all gold stars and unicorns. Let's just say that there are some bumps in the road. I do want to quickly point out that Adobe has done a lot for the open-source community as well. Lightroom is a multiuser application that has been open sourced for years and this update is no exception, meaning that it goes far beyond what was intended to be done. Therefore, you can now make adjustments to your images without having to export them from Lightroom or Photoshop, as long as you are a member of the public community. That's a pretty significant change from Lightroom 3.
