My workflow is to use LR to open up and work on a few images, then move them into LR4 to do some more work. This includes editing my color profiles, using LR4 to create or open a single image, then saving it back into LR5.

Once all images are ready, I'll then have a series of shots in LR5 that I will sync with a series of JPGs using the new auto-sync function. I then send it all off to the web page and let them do the rest.

Reducing the amount of time wasted fiddling with my images in LR4 and finally LR5 has definitely helped me get more done in less time. I have been working with Lightroom for three weeks now and have pretty much invested everything I have into it. I dutifully upgrade each time to the beta version to keep up with whatever new features they decide to shake out for the next iteration.

I have a number of issues with the current version I'd like to share. If there is a bug in this batch, please let me know about it. Here are a few other ways in which the Adobe family of products includes a lot of functionality:

- Adobe Bridge alternating object and mask selections make it very easy to link or unlink an object from a group of other objects. I've written up a brief tutorial on using the mask selection feature with objects in this post— How to Use Adobe Lightroom to Create a Digital Portrait From Old Photos
- User discovered Star Trek footage that was shot in the 1920s. I followed up with some examples of how you would re-color and film-remix video clips using Adobe Premiere Pro CS5.5— How to Film, Film, and Film
- I've written about other features in the Adobe Creative Cloud desktop app bundle, but I also use in Creative Suite. Some of the five apps I cover are Adobe Photoshop CS5, Adobe Illustrator CS5, Adobe Music CS5, Audacity, and Adobe Flash CS5 (together with Adobe Media Encoder) Five Apps in the Adobe Creative Cloud Desktop App Bundle
