As an important part of a professional workflow, Photoshop is a multifunction tool, so if you're an everyday user or someone who typically works alone, a version like Photoshop Elements might be more what you're looking for. Whether the software was created by Adobe or a third-party developer, all the latest versions offer improved performance, a simplified interface, fewer features, and a smaller footprint. These aren't the same editors you'll be using in your everyday workflows, but they'll do the trick for some other use cases you're considering. Like any major update, the biggest change in this release is how it integrates with the Apple iMac 2019 in macOS Catalina. The update brings with it new functionality and slight changes to how the software works. The biggest change is that there appears to be no longer be a registration to use the iMac's Mac App Store and the mobile App Stores. With Lightroom, the Mac App Store is no longer used to install the application and Adobe claims it will no longer be supported in future updates. This means that for Macs running on newer operating systems (OS 10.13+), there will no longer be a license for Adobe Photoshop CC. This doesn't look good for former Lightroom users who wish to remain within the Elements ecosystem. Apple admitted that the decision was made with their "overall goal in mind," and they believe it will be better for users if they stay "focused on a single platform of the primary creative tools." Adobe updates often enough that you will eventually get a version that uses fewer resources, a given that this is a work in progress. And, LOL, you'll get a new, different look for the interface, with new tabs and new item groups, too. At times, after using Lightroom, Photoshop CS5 seems to take longer to load - but still accomplish the tasks in a practical time (but with different interface). You can also set Photoshop to open to a specific zoom level when you launch the program. I made this setting in Lightroom so that, after opening the program, I could use the zoom tool quickly without having to adjust every time I open the application.
